Miss Lizzie Dickinson is visiting in Worcester, Mass.

A private letter from a resident of New Britain to one of our citizens reads in part as follows: "I want to tell you that the critics here regard Miss Grace B. Mix of your town as the finest solo-contralto who ever sang regularly in our city. The present is the lady's third year in the full quartet of the First Baptist church, and it is fair to say that one of the very best positions in the state was also opened to her last January (viz. the South church, where Mr. R. P. Faine is the conductor of music and where the new $20,000 organ is to be placed).

President Sloop of the First National bank here, through whose liberality largely, the present choir of the First Baptist church is a possibility, promptly met the "raise," and Miss Mix was retained.

Miss Mix has just been invited to become a member of a special quartet in town, for funeral services and the like. People here who heard her for the first time last Sunday nearly overwhelmed me by questions regarding her."

A FABLED TREASURE ISLAND.

An Alleged Private Hoard and the Expeditions That Have Failed to Find It. (From the San Francisco Chronicle.)

Dispatches from Panama tell in an uncertain way of the finding of one million dollars in Spanish gold and silver on the island of Cocos, near Veraguas. There has always been much mystery about the treasure which was supposed to be hidden on this island.

A pirate who was vaguely known, as Captain Martin roamed the sea early in the present century. One of his cruises lay along the coast of Peru. After dropping anchor at many of the principal ports along the shore his crew of freebooters boldly invaded the churches of the towns and took with them ecclesiastical treasures of great value.

His crews were robbed and burned, stores were pillaged, and rich men who fell into the hands of the pirates were forced to purchase their freedom at an exorbitant price.

This booty, it has been popularly supposed, was hidden somewhere about the rugged shores of Cocos Island and near Waile Bay. Close to the beach is an immense arch, formed by two cliffs, whose summits meet in one peak. Somewhere along the surface of this arch, on the west side and along the base of the rocky cliffs, it was believed there existed a pivotal rock, which, when released, would reveal an opening to the vault of the long concealed treasure of the Incas and Peruvians. The nearest point on the Central American coast to Cocos Island is Punta Arenas, in Costa Rica, about three hundred miles away. The distance from Panama is fully five hundred and eighty miles.

Early in June, 1893, Captain Geisler of Stockholm, accompanied by ten New York capitalists, chartered the steamer Acapulco for an exploration of the island, the captain being satisfied that he could find the treasure hidden by the pirates. It was on the afternoon of the 21st that the vessel came to anchor in Waile Bay on the north side of the island. Upon the shore of a bend in the bay the treasure seekers saw a small building, and straining their eyes they beheld smoke tumbling from the chimney. Boats were lowered and preparations made to land. As the voyagers neared the beach two men ran from the door of the cabin to the beach. With all the ardent energy of his nature Captain Geisler hurriedly took the party to the spot where he believed the treasure to be hidden. They could not find the pivotal rock, however, and for days and days they lived with the two men whom they found upon the island.

Baffled in their efforts to find the gold and silver, Captain Geisler gloomily and reluctantly weighed anchor and returned to San Francisco.

Seekers for treasure on the Isle of Cocos were known before the Acapulco dropped anchor in its bay. Early in 1892 the schooner Eliza Edwards was fitted out for a mysterious voyage. She sailed away from the harbor of San Diego with eleven men on board. Among them was ex-Mayor Barber of Santa Barbara. The voyagers were provided with an immense stock of provisions, and carried with them a formidable assortment of picks, shovels and spades. The destination of the schooner was Cocos Island. The vessel was three weeks on its way, and during all that time, although frequently hugging the shore closely, not a house or living creature was seen on land.

Ex-Mayor Barber and his men found no treasure on the island, although they remained until their provisions were nearly exhausted.

Still another strange and weird story about the stowaway wealth of Cocos Island was told in 1894 by Charles Henderson of Wauson, O., who claimed that while a boy he ran away to sea, serving as an apprentice under Captain Summers on a vessel plying between New York and Liverpool. Before the late war, and while yet a lad, Henderson claimed that he was on board a privateer and eluding vessel called the Lark. He was afterward sub-officer of the ship.

The Lark made many trips between Africa and the East seas and was always successful. The captain became rich, but no one knew what became of his money. The Lark continued to make trips after slaves, and one day, while near the coast of South America, a United States man-of-war attacked the Lark. The slave was ordered headed for a rendezvous known to none but Henderson and the captain. In their haste to escape the war ship they ran the Lark upon a rock and she rapidly sank, scarcely giving the eight men time to escape.

The captain told Henderson that he had seventy-two thousand dollars in gold on board the ship, and that if he would help him secret it from the crew he would share it with him. All on board the vessel escaped in boats, the captain and Henderson secretly taking the treasure with them. According to this foggy yarn of Henderson they made for an island and there in a cave hid the gold. While on the island, so the story runs, the captain and three of the men died of smallpox and two were drowned by the capsizing of a small boat while returning to the vessel. Henderson, so he says, was picked up by a passing vessel and taken to New Orleans. He afterward tried to get some vessel owner to help him recover the treasure, but without success. Henderson afterward fitted out a ship to go to this mysterious island (supposed to be Cocos), but it is not known that he found more than an island upon which gulls roost and shrub their wings.

The meagre telegrams from Panama to the effect that treasure has been found on the island simply adds more interest to one of the many popular romances of the sea.

"It is curious," said Wilkes, "how Great Britain dominates the world."

"Very," said Barber, "but you can explain it. She never loses a chance to conquer others. Races that her armies do not overcome, her pickles and sauces do. Last year she exported $1,300,000 worth of pickles. Say you get ten pickles for a penny—each pound contains 240 pennies—or 2,400 pickles. One million three hundred thousand times 2,400 is 3,120,000,000. The human race is strong, but it can't withstand as many pickles as that."—Harper's Bazar.
